

Case Study of an Unemployed person

I know a person who is unemployed till the age of 30. His name is Kumar(not real name) who studied in a local school till tenth as we know how an average student and a backbencher concentrates on studies if the school does not concentrate on them. The school he studied was normal and then, as usual, his parents made him join in one of the 2 famous corporate colleges and unusual to an expectation of parents he enjoyed with friends by irritating wardens and lecturers he almost neglected his studies.

As usual, he didn't get into a good college in engineering despite his good interest in MBA his parents made him join some random engineering college. So as he was unable to cope up with the academics as he was not interested in them and failed in most of the subjects. And we know the life then he however came to senses and cleared all the subjects. But by the time he cleared engineering, a certificate became a casual thing to everyone.

But because he had no interest in engineering he was not interested in pursuing further study anymore and tried for a job by going to Hyderabad but he was still guilty for not doing his dream of MBA and he also worked in a coffee shop just to make the ends meet for being independent of parents but he did not get any job for his minimal qualification. So then he decided that he should start working for the dream.

The thing he should have done for getting employment was to tell his dreams and plans clearly and discuss them without fear with his parents at a young age only. So that they will start helping you in your dreams if they are not convinced that your first attempt of expressing yourself has to be the first step towards success I guess.

The thing which I was impressed with him and learned as he did not lose hope after attempting many job interviews and such many failures in the field which his parents chose for him.
